EXTRACTS.

TWILIGHT.

Twilight—and I sat and read:
A lot of words were there,
First girl like a bright-eyed flower,
Blistering life's summer rose.
Gladness—and I tried to weep
Over a face that seemed to sleep—
Far away from home and thought,
We saw our love grow like a rose.
Sun-down—and a grey-haired man
Pore of life's torn cloth and plan:
Tears like almost dead:
By his side a faded rose,
Yellow, withered—"one of those."

THE STORY OF RUSSIAN INTRIGUE IN ASIA.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE RUSSIAN INTRIGUE IN ASIA."

Having completed the narrative of Russia's engagements with regard to Khiva, we resume the story of her pledges in respect of Afghanistan. We have shown that in January, 1878, England achieved a diplomatic victory over Russia by obtaining the line of the Upper Oxus as the boundary of Afghanistan, and that Russia, in return, pledged herself to hold this country responsible for Shere Ali's good behavior. England did not formally repudiate that obligation, though Mr. Gladstone declared in Parliament that the responsibility referred solely to "moral influence." Our negotiations with Shere Ali were directed towards making that responsibility a reality. The Amir, alarmed at the prospect of the Khivan expedition and the reported advance upon Merv, declined to share England's confidence in the promises of Russia. Directly after the fall of Khiva he sent a special envoy to the Viceroy of India, at Simla, to express his apprehensions and to suggest means of mutual defence. In these communications the Amir endeavored to make the British Government understand that the safety of Afghanistan was essentially necessary to the safety of India, and he proposed that the British Government should assist him with money and arms. Money he had already received to the extent of two lakhs of rupees, and he was now promising to add another two lakhs, and to send him 5,000 British rifles. But Shere Ali appeared that these large grants did not satisfy the Amir's wants. He evidently thought it the duty of England to supply him with whatever he deemed necessary to place Afghanistan secure from invasion. He declared a Russian advance upon Merv, and he wished to make this country responsible for protecting him against the consequences of that advance being continued to Herat. The English Government showed no unwillingness to accept a considerable share of the duty which the Amir desired to place upon them. It was decided that "in the event of any aggression from Russia, the British Government would do all in its power to afford material assistance in repelling an invader," and Lord Derby stated in the House of Lords (May 8, 1874) that "it was highly probable this country would interfere" in the case of any attack upon the independence of Afghanistan. Nevertheless the negotiations with the Amir failed to result in anything more than a definite course of action arose from the refusal of Shere Ali to enter into reciprocal engagements. He declined to accept a proposed survey by English officers of the frontier which he considered to be exposed to Russian attack; and he was equally indisposed to permit the presence of British troops at Kabul, Herat, or Kandahar, whom the English Government desired to place there in order to prevent this country from undertaking any measures on behalf of Shere Ali from the English alliance. The circumstances which led to it are not within the scope of this article. Suffice it to say that shortly after the Simla conference had revealed to the Amir that England considered some return for her responsibility necessary on his part, we find him in communication with General Kaufmann. That officer was wise enough to express horror at the rebellion of Yakub Khan, which naturally led to the Amir's belief that our intervention in the young prince's behalf. But all the time that General Kaufmann was thus coquetting with Shere Ali, Prince Gortschakoff was renewing his promises to have nothing to do with Afghanistan. The last engagement of which we took notice was in January, 1874, when the Russian ambassador at Simla, Prince Gortschakoff, in the name of the Russian Government, had given to the Amir a pledge to have nothing to do with Afghanistan. The last engagement of which we took notice was in January, 1874, when the Russian ambassador at Simla, Prince Gortschakoff, in the name of the Russian Government, had given to the Amir a pledge to have nothing to do with Afghanistan.

While these varied negotiations were going on respecting the many points threatened by Russia's advance, she was tranquilly continuing her course of pledge-breaking in regard to Bokhara and Khokand. Just as the conquest of Tashkend followed that of Tashkend notwithstanding the famous circular of 1874; just as the occupation of Khokand and Samarkand succeeded that of Tashkend, spite of similar reassuring dispatches, so, in the face of reiterated engagements to the contrary, the remnants of Khokandian territory and Bokharian independence were destroyed. As will be remembered here often the Amir and his Chancellor professed to regret the conquest of the northern portion of Bokhara, how frequently they described increases of territory as altogether opposed to their wishes; how, as a proof of that disposition, they promised to restore Samarkand; and how they asseverated their firm resolve never to annex any more Bokharian territory. They have not even yet surrendered Samarkand; they added another tower to their Bokharian possessions, and to crown all this, they concluded, in 1878, a treaty with the Amir which virtually placed his country in their possession. The course of procedure with regard to Bokhara was a singularly successful one. In the first place, the Amir, by his own admission, was the aggressor in the conquest of the territory. Then were the same promises that the terms of Russian advance in that region had been reached, and that what was left should be independent. Nevertheless, on the 7th of February, 1878, the portion of Bokhara which had been promised to the Amir under the rule of Khudayar Khan was annexed, and received the name of Fergana, its feodatory State of Karatag being alone left in a condition of semi-independence.

The recent development of Russian activity in Central Asia should be no surprise to those who have followed the progress of the German newspaper informed us that an expedition was being concentrated at Krasnovodsk, composed partly of Russian troops and partly of militia selected from the local tribes. That statement was corroborated by the fact that 10,000 men were ordered to march from Tashkend to the Russian frontier, and that the Russian papers daily hinted that General Malikoff was preparing an expedition against the Turcomans of 20,000 men. The true meaning of this announcement was that Russia was preparing for a demonstration against India by way of Merv. The Amir, who was now promised to add another two lakhs of rupees, and to send him 5,000 British rifles. But Shere Ali appeared that these large grants did not satisfy the Amir's wants. He evidently thought it the duty of England to supply him with whatever he deemed necessary to place Afghanistan secure from invasion.
